

As the number of faculty colleagues increases linearly, the number of possible links among us grows geometrically. Thus, much of the capacity and vitality of the faculty comes from connection among colleagues.

The benefits of a strong faculty network are higher quality education for students and greater professional satisfaction and accomplishment. The characteristics of a weak network include the needless repetition of previous accomplishments, the lack of follow up on important questions and work on important tasks, the absence of consensus on the definition of important concepts and elements of the factual situation, and the absence of a shared sense of significant events and choices made in the life of the college and faculty. The future of student learning and the faculty is at stake in the quality of faculty connections.

Join faculty colleagues for the two day program just before the start of fall term. To participate, contact :
